The Good-Enough Threshold

A worksheet that defines the shipping criteria before work begins. Done becomes a pre-commitment, not an in-the-moment fight against the pull of one more improvement.

THE DRAIN

For WHY-HOW and HOW-WHY profiles, shipping is the drain: there is always a deeper understanding to reach, a cleaner version to build. The decision to release, made in the moment, loses to the pull of completeness every time, and work stays invisible long past the point of value.

WHAT THIS TOOL DOES

The threshold moves the shipping decision to the start, when perspective is intact. Before work begins you define what must be true to release, what further polish would add and what it would cost, and who accepts the work. When the criteria are met, the decision is already made.

HOW TO USE IT

- 1 Fill it in before starting. Once you are inside the work, the threshold will drift upward. Set it from outside.
- 2 Agree it with the receiver. Their standard for acceptable is usually lower than yours. Let that be data.
- 3 Post it visibly. The threshold only holds if it is in view when the pull toward more arrives.
- 4 Ship at the threshold. Improvements beyond it go in version two, informed by real feedback.

The threshold questions

- | | | |
|---|----------------------------|---|
| 1 | What must be true to ship? | Three to five checkable criteria. The floor, agreed up front. |
| 2 | What would "better" add? | Name the marginal value of another week, honestly. |
| 3 | What does "better" cost? | The delay, the invisibility, the work not started. |
| 4 | Who accepts it? | The named receiver whose yes means shipped. |
| 5 | The ship date | A real date. Criteria met plus date arrived equals released. |

WHAT IT WON'T DO

The threshold will not make releasing feel comfortable; the pull toward completeness is your wiring, not a flaw in the tool. What it does is convert an emotional decision into a contractual one. If you override it, do so out loud, as a scope change.
