The Progress Broadcast

A fill-in weekly update format, four lines, five minutes. Communicating momentum stops being a writing task and becomes a form.

THE DRAIN

The weekly update is a momentum performance, and for tertiary WHAT profiles it drains twice: once to notice what counts as progress, once to write it in the upbeat register the genre expects. So updates get skipped, and silence gets read, wrongly, as stalling.

WHAT THIS TOOL DOES

The broadcast replaces composition with completion. Four fixed lines, Shipped, Moving, Blocked, Next, one sentence each, sourced straight from the Momentum Board. No narrative, no register management, no blank page. The reader gets exactly what they wanted, and it cost you five minutes.

The format

- | | |
|-----------|---|
| 1 Shipped | What went out the door this week. Can be "nothing this week", said plainly. |
| 2 Moving | The active work and its current state, one line. |
| 3 Blocked | What is stuck and what you need. This line does real work for you. |
| 4 Next | The one thing that moves first next week. |

HOW TO USE IT

- 1 Send it at the same time weekly. The reliability is most of the message. Predictable beats polished.
- 2 Pull from the Momentum Board. If the board is current, the broadcast is a copy-paste with trimming.
- 3 Never skip a quiet week. "Shipped: nothing, deep in X, on track for the 14th" is a strong update, not an admission.
- 4 Use Blocked without apology. It is the highest-leverage line, a standing, low-cost way to ask for what you need.

WHAT IT WON'T DO

The broadcast reports momentum; it cannot manufacture it, and dressing up a stalled month in good broadcasts is a misuse that erodes exactly the trust it is meant to build. If Shipped has been empty for three weeks, the tool to reach for is the Threshold, not the thesaurus.
